

Pricing strategies

1) Complete the table below - placing the correct pricing strategy with the explanation

The strategies you can select from are as follows:

Skimming, penetration, predatory, discrimination, competitor based, demand based, cost based, psychological pricing, loss leading

Name of strategy	Explanation	Examples of use
	A firm undercuts competitors to force them out of the market. Once this has happened they put their prices back up
	This means that different people are charged different amounts at different times for exactly the same product
	This is when a product is sold at a loss to generate interest from customers in other products that are sold by the company
	This is when a company uses the price of £99.99 rather than £100 to try to get people to think it is a little cheaper than it is
	This is when a firm works out what it costs to produce an item and then adds an amount on top of this to contribute towards profits. This is a simple method and is therefore used quite often
	Firms try to work out what people are prepared to pay (perhaps using market research) and then charge that amount
	This is done by looking at what other similar products are priced at and then setting a similar price
	This involves setting a low price at first to gain market share as quickly as possible before raising it a little later
	This is the opposite to the above and involves setting a very high price at first before bringing the price down as competition in the market increases

Pricing strategies

1) Complete the table below - placing the correct pricing strategy with the explanation

The strategies you can select from are as follows:

Skimming, penetration, predatory, discrimination, competitor based, demand based, cost based, psychological pricing, loss leading

Name of strategy	Explanation	Examples of use
	A firm undercuts competitors to force them out of the market. Once this has happened they put their prices back up
	This means that different people are charged different amounts at different times for exactly the same product
	This is when a product is sold at a loss to generate interest from customers in other products that are sold by the company
	This is when a company uses the price of £99.99 rather than £100 to try to get people to think it is a little cheaper than it is
	This is when a firm works out what it costs to produce an item and then adds an amount on top of this to contribute towards profits. This is a simple method and is therefore used quite often
	Firms try to work out what people are prepared to pay (perhaps using market research) and then charge that amount
	This is done by looking at what other similar products are priced at and then setting a similar price
	This involves setting a low price at first to gain market share as quickly as possible before raising it a little later
	This is the opposite to the above and involves setting a very high price at first before bringing the price down as competition in the market increases

www.igcsebusiness.co.uk